Agency
Learners in charge

Teaching for Success
Simon Davidson

FOR THE IB PROGRAMMES
Every effort has been made to trace all copyright holders, but if any have been inadvertently overlooked, the Publishers will be pleased to make the necessary arrangements at the first opportunity.

Although every effort has been made to ensure that website addresses are correct at time of going to press, Hodder Education cannot be held responsible for the content of any website mentioned in this book. It is sometimes possible to find a relocated web page by typing in the address of the home page for a website in the URL window of your browser.

Hachette UK’s policy is to use papers that are natural, renewable and recyclable products and made from wood grown in well-managed forests and other controlled sources. The logging and manufacturing processes are expected to conform to the environmental regulations of the country of origin.

Orders: please contact Bookpoint Ltd, 130 Park Drive, Milton Park, Abingdon, Oxon OX14 4SE. Telephone: +44 (0)1235 827827, Fax: +44 (0)1235 400401. Email education@bookpoint.co.uk Lines are open from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m., Monday to Saturday, with a 24-hour message answering service. You can also order through our website: www.hoddereducation.com

ISBN: 9781510481121

© Simon Davidson 2020

First published in 2020 by
Hodder Education,
An Hachette UK Company
Carmelite House
50 Victoria Embankment
London EC4Y 0DZ

www.hoddereducation.com

Impression number 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1

Year 2024 2023 2022 2021 2020

All rights reserved. Apart from any use permitted under UK copyright law, no part of this publication may be reproduced or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic or mechanical, including photocopying and recording, or held within any information storage and retrieval system, without permission in writing from the pubusher or under licence from the Copyright Licensing Agency Limited. Further details of such licences (for reprographic reproduction) may be obtained from the Copyright Licensing Agency Limited, www.cla.co.uk

Cover photo © Gundolf Renze – stock.adobe.com

Typeset in

Printed in Italy

A catalogue record for this title is available from the British Library.
Contents

Introduction ................................................................. 2

Chapter 1
What is agency? .......................................................... 5

Chapter 2
Voice ........................................................................ 14

Chapter 3
Choice ...................................................................... 29

Chapter 4
Ownership .................................................................. 45

Chapter 5
Agency and models of learning ..................................... 59

Chapter 6
New demands on learners ............................................. 65

Chapter 7
IB, agency and skills for learning .................................. 72

Chapter 8
Mindset and agency ...................................................... 80

Chapter 9
Agency and inclusion .................................................. 88

Chapter 10
Agents of rigour .......................................................... 95

Chapter 11
Communities of learning agents .................................. 104

Chapter 12
Teacher roles and fostering interaction .......................... 117

Chapter 13
Self-direction, play and creativity ................................. 123

Chapter 14
Service learning and action ........................................... 134

Chapter 15
Teachers are also agentic learners ................................. 146

Chapter 16
Conclusions ................................................................. 155

Bibliography .................................................................. 159

Index ........................................................................... 162
Introduction

Agency in IB: learners in charge of their learning

We all like to have some control over our lives and what happens around us. From childhood, we don't like to be forced to eat certain foods. We get frustrated when we lose control of our work situation. We feel inspired when we are in charge of something interesting or important to us. We like to be able to organize our own homes and our free time. We like to feel that we can influence events.

When I was a child in school, I liked it most when I felt in control. Sometimes this was in the playground, helping to organize football teams. Other times I worked out for myself how to calculate an integral, or I wrote the wording for motions for a student-run debating society. I was less engaged when I had to work in a specific way through an exercise that seemed irrelevant to me.

When I first started teaching, I disliked how little agency my students sometimes had, but I found it hard to balance controlling difficult classes with empowering them to learn in their own ways. Without knowing the term, and without the skills to do it, I always wished to give them agency, with more active roles in their own learning. Perhaps that is one of the reasons why I gravitated towards the IB programmes.

Agency is a complex concept

Rather than merely 'letting go' of control, we look at how students can progressively 'take control' of all the aspects of their own learning, and eventually be in charge of their own lives. We keep both the student and their learning at the centre, as we see how a student becomes a 'learning agent' through 'self-efficacy' (their abilities and confidence to succeed in specific situations and accomplish tasks).

For us, agency doesn't take the rather weak meaning of an intermediary, like property agents arranging letting or selling. Rather, an agent is in charge of themselves. This is worth more than James Bond's 'double 0' code – students are all special agents of their own learning.
Agency highlights how people act, make decisions and learn how to think for themselves. The concept of agency helps us avoid some of the traps common to student-centred learning, such as dwelling too long on a student’s particular likes and dislikes. Instead, it brings out what is central to their learning: how students make decisions, how they develop organizationally; the skills they need to manage their own learning. It shows how they self-evaluate and set goals.

This book is about putting the spotlight on such learners and what learning means to them. It does not claim to introduce brand new insights, but brings together some important ideas and concepts, under the umbrella of understanding the implications of agency for learners who use the four IB programmes.

Chapter previews

We begin with an overview of agency in Chapter 1. The following three chapters (Chapters 2–4) look at the three aspects of agency identified by the IB: voice; choice; and ownership. Student voice helps them working out and expressing their own thinking, as well as being aware of the thoughts of others. Choice moves beyond simply selecting preferences to being aware of one’s own learning and considering options before making choices. When their voice is heard and their choices respected, students develop their sense of ownership. It brings the intrinsic motivation and responsibility for one’s own learning that leads to long term success.

Chapter 5 looks at the relationship between agency and the most relevant models of learning for the IB. These models are developing, due to both advances in psychology, and because of changes in society, which present new challenges and possibilities.

Chapter 6 looks at the extra need for agency in the twenty-first century, while Chapter 7 looks at the tradition of developing agency through the IB programmes, for example, in the core of the diploma, and how approaches to learning provides a useful language for continuing to enhance agency in IB learning.

Chapter 8 looks at how the work of Carol Dweck can help us provide students with mindsets that support agency. Chapter 9 looks at how students with individual learning needs benefit from a particularly strong focus of agency, so that they learn to take charge of whatever modification or accommodations will make them most successful.
Chapter 10 emphasizes how a deeper and more authentic sense of rigour comes from a thorough approach to agency – sometimes it can look like the most rigorous approaches come from a tight sense of control from teachers and school management.

Chapter 11 looks at how agency is not just individual. It arises from a healthy community which jointly owns learning, with a clear sense of purpose, and with roles and relationships that support students with developing their voice and making their own choices.

Chapter 12 looks at how teachers can also foster interaction, by using forms of interaction and planning that promote agency most effectively. Chapter 13 then looks at how play promotes agency, and how flow and gamification can enhance learning.

Chapter 14 looks at service learning, which can provide one of the most meaningful contexts for students to develop and apply their own agency to real world situations and genuine needs. It is not only students’ learning that benefits from agency. Teachers’ professional learning, as well as their actions, are at their best when they have meaningful voices and choices, and when they take ownership of their professional growth. This is explored in Chapter 15.

Chapter 16 concludes by summarizing the potential and the challenges of making agency central to our vision for learning.

- Not only IB

This book is written particularly with IB schools in mind, and to work across the four programmes, but the ideas are relevant to all forward-thinking educators. Best practice is not, of course, limited to IB schools. Many teachers wish their students to become autonomous and empowered learners, who will develop the tools to continue learning throughout their lives. This book stems from IB practices but it is not written to be exclusively used by IB schools, and blends IB vocabulary with terms commonly used elsewhere.

- How to use this book

Naturally, since readers are also agents in charge of their own thinking and professional practice, one should feel free to use the book in any way that is helpful. To help with this, each chapter starts with an ‘In a nutshell’ summary of the chapter. Some readers may prefer to read only the summaries before choosing which chapters are most relevant to read in depth. Some may prefer to read individually, others as part of a professional learning community. This book is only a starting point. Be an agent – make its ideas your own!